CYBER THREATS TO YOUR IDENTITY

While computers and the internet offer huge benefits, they also offer cyber criminals opportunities to steal personal information. Cyber crooks have shown they can keep up with the fast-paced growth of technology. They constantly develop new tools and methods to trick and exploit people through computer and internet use. The more aware you are of cyber threats, the more prepared you will be to avoid them.

"Malware" is a broad term for the many forms of malicious software designed to disrupt, harm, or hijack a computer system or data. It includes viruses and spyware. Secretly installed without your knowledge or consent, malware programs can damage your privacy and the security of your computer or mobile device. They can capture your personal information in a variety of ways and secretly send it to identity thieves.

Computers and mobile devices are commonly infected with malware through email attachments, downloads, and the links within emails, instant messages, or pop-up windows.

Carefully read all disclosures, including the privacy statement and licensing agreement, before downloading and installing software. Malware may be bundled in with it. Look for wording about personal information collection, internet activity monitoring, or additional programs.

Warning signs of malware include:

- computer crashes
- slow or sluggish performance
- repeated error messages
- seeing new icons on your desktop
- finding a new toolbar added to your browser
- being automatically sent to websites you didn't mean to
- an unintended reset to a new internet home page that can't be undone
- getting bombarded with pop-up ads and/or ads popping up when a browser isn't open
- your online search result pages show only ads

Decreased battery life, interrupted or dropped calls, and crashing apps on mobile devices are also warning signs of a malware infection.

Malware can be hard to remove. If you suspect it: immediately stop all online activities that require you to enter any kind of personal information; update and then run your security software; get reliable tech support if possible.
